

Quarterly Issues Report
WLFI-TV
First Quarter, 2008

Agriculture and Business

The transition to digital television transition is one year away. WLFI began airing a series of reports explaining the transition, how it will affect viewers, and whether they needed to purchase a converter box to continue receiving broadcasts.

Ownership of the cable television company serving the Lafayette area changed during the first quarter of 2008. By the end of the quarter, customers of the new company, Comcast, were complaining of problems including interruption of internet service, billing problems, and inability to reach customer service representatives. A Comcast representative said the company was attempting to work with its new customers and said the company was attempting to make the ownership transition smoother.

Crime

Efforts to establish a Juvenile Justice Center in Tippecanoe County took some steps forward. The County had not definitively decided whether to fund a center, but it did hire an architect to begin planning how such a center would be configured. The County also began searching for properties where a Juvenile Justice Center could be built. WLFI highlighted a recent survey on teen drug use, which showed nearly 19 percent of high school seniors reported using marijuana in the previous month. WLFI showed how popular social networking websites often contain blatant references to drug use among teens.

Roads and Transportation

WLFI kept viewers abreast of changing road conditions during a New Year storm that brought heavy snow and high winds to the area.

The station explained new public transportation routes adopted by CityBus in the face of an expanding population on Lafayette's south side.

Construction on the Lafayette to Logansport section of the Hoosier Heartland Corridor was accelerated during the first quarter. The project will eventually link Lafayette to Fort Wayne with a four-lane highway. Construction on the Lafayette to Logansport section is now scheduled to begin in 2008, rather than 2010.

The Indiana Department of Transportation announced during the first quarter that it could not afford construction of the U.S. 231 Bypass around the south and west side of the Purdue University campus. Local planners consider the bypass a key to the area's future transportation and economic development needs. The station provided coverage of ongoing efforts to modify the project to keep it on track for construction.
